PRESIDENT'S REPORT

Public lines up with grocery workers

Our contract negotiations with representatives of Albertsons, Ralphs and Vons are continuing, with more talks scheduled through the middle of August.

Unfortunately, progress remains slow as the employers continue to insist on shifting health care costs to our members.

In the meantime, the companies have expanded their misleading propaganda campaigns directed to our members and the public. Their goal is to reduce anxiety concerning the main sticking point in the negotiations, which is health care.

However, in a recent interview, a Ralphs spokesperson confirmed that the employers' proposal imposes an $8,000 out-of-pocket maximum on workers each year. When you include premiums and deductibles, the annual cost could exceed $11,000.

Out of reach for grocery workers

These amounts are totally out of reach for grocery workers. It's wrong for these companies, which are making billions in profit, to drive the very workers who have made them profitable into poverty.

A recent independent poll commissioned by your union shows that consumers are firmly and overwhelmingly on our side. They have a favorable view of us, recognizing that grocery workers are courteous and reasonable people who work hard to support our families.

The poll indicated that nearly 90 percent of consumers would support a strike if it helped us get a fair contract. This is important, because support from the shopping public is key to our cause.

PRESIDENT'S REPORT

Public lines up with workers

We also have strong support from religious leaders, elected officials and members of other labor unions. Hundreds of grocery stores have been adopted by local community groups, churches, labor organizations and individuals who are pledging their support for grocery workers. They are willing to do their part to ensure that the middle class has a future in our communities.

It is critical that we stand united in defending our health care and wages. Until we secure a fair contract, we cannot waver. We must continue to show our solidarity.

Let your fellow workers know, and let management know, that we have the community and consumers on our side in this fight, and it's time to negotiate a fair contract!

UNION REPRESENTATIVE'S REPORT

Be smart with social media

Use Facebook on your own time

By Pete Waasdorp

A few years ago we had to call our friends to see what they were up to. Now we can simply log in to Facebook or follow them on Twitter.

Social networking technology has come far in a short amount of time. When it is used correctly, it can improve our lives in many ways. But with this new technology comes great responsibility.

When you're on the clock, you should be doing one thing: your job. Doing anything else, including checking your messages on Facebook, can get you in trouble.

Most people don't think about it when they "like" a comment or share a cute picture of their niece or nephew, but all of their activities on Facebook are time-stamped and recorded. Twitter posts are recorded the same way.

That information can provide management all the evidence it needs to get you written up or worse.

Even the things that are said by your friends can get you in trouble.

Take, for example, this scenario: On a member's birthday, his friends wrote on Facebook about the wonderful time they had while downing a few beers with him during his lunch break. Not long after that, his employer asked him if he was drinking on the job.

Nothing hidden

It's all up there for the world to see: Not only what you said or what was said about you, but when it was said.

It's also wise to use caution in "friending" people, especially those with whom you work. No matter how good a "friend" your manager or co-worker might be, remember that they know where you are and what you've been doing. That's not always a good thing.

If a co-worker reports you for something, as part of the investigation your manager could be required to check on you. Being your "friend" will give him or her extra access to your daily activities.

By all means, keep enjoying your experiences on Facebook, Twitter and other social media. Just be careful about it.

And, for goodness sake, do it on your own time.

When you're on the clock, you should be checking groceries, not your status updates!

Grocery workers take message to

Clergy and labor allies join rallies in Arcadia

Chanting “Health care, not welfare!” and “We don’t want to strike, but we will if we have to!” thousands of UFCW members delivered a message of unity and defiance to the corporate offices of Albertsons, Ralphs and Vons on June 28.

Members representing UFCW local unions in all parts of Southern California gathered in Arcadia, Fullerton and Compton to march, sing labor songs and wave signs at passing motorists. They cheered as speakers urged the companies to agree to a fair contract that preserves access to affordable health care for supermarket workers.

Joining the grocery workers were rabbis, ministers, priests and imams from Clergy and Laity United for Economic Justice, as well as volunteers from allied unions and representatives from regional Central Labor Councils, the Los Angeles Alliance for a New Economy, Jobs With Justice, SCOPE, Good Jobs L.A. and other groups.

The workers roared as the big blue tractor-trailer of the Food & Drug Council, with the names of its 45 affiliated labor organizations painted on its sides, rolled onto the scene, its air horns blasting a loud statement of solidarity.

Near Ralphs’ vast distribution center in Compton, drivers honked their horns in support as demonstrators presented banners on a bridge that spans the congested 91 Freeway.

Television crews on the ground and in a hovering helicopter recorded all three of the rallies. Reporters swarmed around clergy members as they marched to the buildings to ask the grocery companies to respect the dignity of their workers.

The day began on Michillinda Avenue in Arcadia, where Vons’ corporate offices share a quiet, tree-lined street with modest homes.

Empty parking lot

Officers from the Arcadia Police Department watched as several hundred demonstrators marched, noisily but peacefully, about 200 yards from a Ralphs store to the entrance of the Vons complex. The parking lot was empty on this Tuesday morning and the gates were locked.

Grocery workers from Albertsons, Ralphs and Vons wore their company uniforms as they stood on the back of a flatbed truck to address the demonstrators. They described their difficulties in making ends meet and urged their fellow union members to stand strong against company proposals to shift as much as $11,000 in yearly health care costs onto workers who earn, on average, about twice that amount.

Maria Elena Durazo, executive secretary-treasurer of the Los Angeles County Federation of Labor, pointed out that the grocery companies made $5 billion in profits last year and can afford to shoulder an extra 3 percent in costs to preserve current standards of health care for their employees.

Alhambra, Fullerton and Compton on June 28

Two hours later, similar messages were shared with demonstrators in front of Albertsons' regional offices in Fullerton.

"Their business plan relies on fear and they believe we're too afraid to walk out," 21-year Albertsons checker Kelly Pierce said about the grocery employers. "They don't understand that, for a lot of us, our health care plans are the only things keeping us in this industry."

As Joe Reilly, a 90-year-old veteran of World War II and a proud retiree

'They don't understand that, for a lot of us, our health care plans are the only things keeping us in this industry.'

member of the Machinists Union, spoke about union solidarity, a delegation of grocery workers walked arm-in-arm with clergy members to deliver a letter to Albertsons management.

The letter, signed by religious leaders, urges the company to negotiate a contract that enables workers to raise their families as members of the middle class.

Security personnel at the entrance to the empty parking lot directed the delegation to the front door, where a man who identified himself as "Jim" accepted the letter before re-entering the building and closing the door behind him.

The demonstrators assembled for their third and final rally of the day in front of Ralphs' corporate offices and distribution center in Compton.

They met on a narrow, hilly lawn near an iron fence outside the huge complex. Only a small frontage road separated them from the roaring rush hour traffic on the 91 Freeway.

Following testimonies by grocery workers and chants by the demonstrators, a new delegation of religious leaders walked along the fence to the main gates, where a spokeswoman for Ralphs met them. After she accepted their letter, the activists gathered in a circle and prayed for justice for Ralphs workers.

"All faiths believe in justice," said Pastor Bridie C. Roberts, program director of the Los Angeles chapter of Clergy and Laity United for Economic Justice.

The workers concluded the day with a procession to the Acacia Avenue freeway overpass, where they displayed banners saying "Please Support Grocery Workers."

Many drivers honked their horns to express their sympathy for the workers' cause. Among them were several drivers of Ralphs trucks heading toward their employer's distribution center.

Reaching for the skies

Derek Nelson wants to design machines to take us to the stars

Recently, Atlantis made its final landing, bringing the era of the Space Shuttle to an end.

For many it was a time to reflect on the past and future of America's exploration of new frontiers.

Cal Poly sophomore Derek Nelson chooses to look at the possibilities of the next stage of space transportation and his own role in making it happen.

Does he think he's some kind of rocket scientist? Actually, he is one.

Nelson's prospects as an aerospace engineering student earned him a $10,000 scholarship in the UFCW & Food Employers Trust Fund Scholarship Contest.

"I was at school in an engineering class when my dad sent me a text message picture of the award letter," Nelson said. "I showed my friend the phone, but we couldn't celebrate because we had to be quiet.

"I was very excited, but also thankful and grateful for the honor."

Rocket man

Nelson said he always had an interest in aerospace engineering, with the emphasis on "space."

"My uncles were involved in NASA and the Jet Propulsion Laboratory," he said. "And that's what I'm aiming for when I finish school.

"I'm looking at the major aerospace firms like Boeing and Lockheed-Martin, but I want to work in the structural engineering area with an emphasis on space flight."

Nelson graduated King High School and participated in its five-course pre-engineering program.

"I was really fortunate to have my high school experience," he said. "The program was called 'Lead the Way' and we took basic courses in electronics, prototyping, etc.

Derek Nelson

"They taught us the basics, which prepared me for entering college in engineering."

Nelson also participates in the Math, Engineering and Science Achievement (MESA) program at Cal Poly.

"It's a program for middle and high school students to encourage study in engineering," he said. "We hold competitions for designing projects like gliders and mousetrap racers here at Cal Poly for members of the program."

Recognition

His dedication to his field has not gone unnoticed at college. He is a member of the Sigma Gamma Tau National Aerospace Engineering Honor Society and has been on the dean's list for his first three quarters.

"I'd really like to get on the CubeSat Satellite Team," he said. "It's really prestigious and hard to get into."

When he is not at school, Nelson lives with his mom, dad and sister (now a senior at King High).

In high school, he was a member of the cross-country and track teams, "which are the same people, but in different seasons," he said.

"I don't run as much as I used to, but I have a lot more to keep me busy."

What is more important, her health ...

Once again Albertsons, Ralphs and Vons are celebrating record profits. But instead of sharing their successes, they are asking their employees to accept cuts that would gut their healthcare plan and amount to a $7,000 per year pay cut. Please fill out the card below to tell these companies to do the right thing.

Grocery workers don't want to strike

But they are leaving us no choice

Thank you for your support in our fight for a fair contract with Ralphs, Vons, and Albertsons.

These highly profitable corporations are trying to add to their bottom line by asking for more sacrifice from their employees. Management is proposing cuts to our healthcare plan so drastic that coverage would be cut off much for most workers, the cost of many of whom work part-time (with no hope of becoming full-time) and earn less than $20,000 a year.

We understand times are hard. We are thankful for our jobs and want to keep them. But we can't think asking for a pay wage and all relative would harm the our families in too much to ask for them to continue paying record-breaking profits.

Your support has made the difference for us in this past year and we're hoping you will help us once again.
